With this work we intend to evaluate these approaches in one of the project's case studies.

The activities to be carried out are

1. Study of approaches for operational resource management in rural firefighting, including the approaches developed under O3F.
2. Survey of software for operational resource management in wildland fires.
3. Study of the use of the PyO3F framework (optimization framework for forest fires in python).
4. Collection / estimation of the impact of different resources on different terrains / fuels.
5. Survey of existing resources in one of the project's case studies.
6. Conducting computational experiments with PyO3F and if possible (depending on the outcome of activity 2) other software on the case study.

The aim is the evaluation, based on computational experiments and a case study based on real data, of the different existing approaches for the operational management of rural fire fighting. The main evaluation criteria are the comprehensiveness and depth of this evaluation.
