To achieve this objective, the following work plan shall be carried out:

1. State-of-the-art review on the application of machine vision techniques to deformable materials such as leather, focusing on defect detection and geometry identification;
2. Definition of system requirements, including the study of environmental conditions, with a focus on lighting, reflections, and surface variability of leather. This will involve testing different cameras, lenses, and lighting configurations to minimize reflections and ensure consistent image acquisition;
3. Selection of hardware components and definition of technical specifications for testing;
4. Development of software for contour detection, texture analysis for distinguishing hides, and surface condition identification based on Machine Learning techniques.
5. Extraction of key points for the manipulation of leather by automated robotic systems.
